WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mild temperatures continue for the next week with breezy north winds today. High pressure over the eastern Pacific will continue to build, while a thermal trough develops over interior California. Dry and sunny weather will continue into Sunday. Thunderstorms will be possible over the interior mountains during the upcoming week.

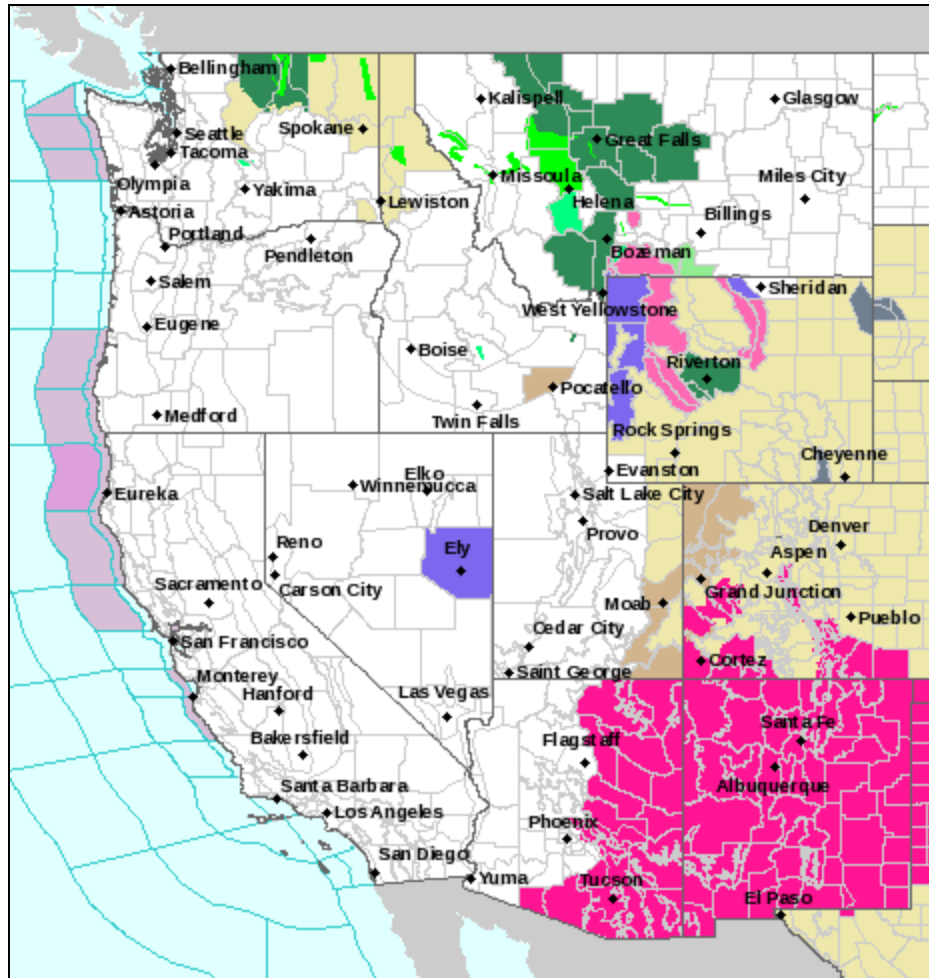

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

There is a chance of rain and drizzle this morning across Ventura and Los Angeles counties. Partial clearing is expected Sunday, but there could be drizzle again in the morning.

Low pressure centered over the Great Basin will move little through early next week as it slowly weakens. This will keep a healthy dose of marine clouds along and west of the mountains, onshore flow, and below average temperatures. By mid next week, another low pressure system will arrive off the Pacific, to reinforce the moist and cool conditions over Southern California. Wednesday looks to be the warmest day of the week, then cooler into next weekend with a chance of more drizzle Thursday night. The combination of low pressure aloft and the occasional coastal eddy, will favor a seasonally deep marine layer with more persistent clouds at times and cool days through next week.
